Dewey's Victory Reported After Three Days' Delay

Speed of Radio and Present Day Communications Thrown into Sharp Relief When Event of 31 Years Ago is Recalled.—Change Remarkable

BY FLORENCE V. KAINSBY The rapid development of communications in the last three decades in which radio has played so important a part is emphasized and brought into sharp relief with the recollection of the Battle of Manila Bay on the 13th anniversary, May 1, for three days the Navy Department and the people of the country had no official word of the battle.

Newspapers on May 2 had brief announcements of the victory of Commodore George Dewey and his squadron, one of which had been sent by the operator at the Manila cable station before the cable was cut, but these reports were very confusing and full details were not known until a message was received at Washington from Dewey on May 4, 1898.

It was not until May 4, however, when the aftermath and the details of the victory had been cared for. Admiral Dewey explained later, "that I found it convenient to send the message to Hongkong to transmit to Washington the complete news of what the squadron had accomplished, where they were and the details of the battle."

Had present day equipment been available when the Battle of Manila took place, Commodore Dewey would not have had to send the McCullough to Hongkong because the cable was cut in order to transmit an authentic account of what transpired to his superior officers in Washington.

Sending Time Cut Today communication with the Philippines is a matter of three to four hours, using the high frequencies of short waves, and the Navy Department, through its transpacific service, maintains constant contact with the archipelago. San Francisco is the nerve center of the navy's transpacific network which, in addition to the Philippines, includes transmissions to China and Honolulu.

The growth of this fast service has been gradual, of course, with many difficult barriers in the way, chief among them being the static which made wireless practically useless during certain periods of the year until the discovery of the value of short waves. However, the wireless circuits now operated by the navy were put in commission several years ago and have been developed and extended as the art of transmission developed.

In the not so long ago, a message was relayed from Washington to San Francisco, to Honolulu, to Cavite, in the Philippines, but with the development of short wave equipment, only the two operations are necessary—the transmission of the message to the navy radio station where it is sent via short waves directly to the short wave receiver at the navy station in Manila.

Army Net Plays Part A message destined for Washington from the Philippines is sent by the operator who desires to communicate with the navy station, where it is immediately broadcast via short wave to San Francisco, where it is received by the Pacific coast operator. It is immediately turned over to the army radio net, which sends it to Washington.

If the question put be an important one, the officer may expect a reply from Washington during the ninth hour after the message leaves the Philippines. The navy does not maintain a network of continental broadcasting stations, conducting itself only to transpacific communication. On the other hand, the army radio net does not have the navy Department's navy radio operators working battle ships in the vicinity of the Philippines with ease.

In addition to handling busy business of the new equipment of Station WNYC, the New York municipal broadcasting station, is a wire control room for the continuing collection of news items from the Mail in Central Park to 25 other parks in the Metropolitan Area, where they are reproduced by loudspeakers.

WNYC Wires City's Parks A part of the new equipment of Station WNYC, the New York municipal broadcasting station, is a wire control room for the continuing collection of news items from the Mail in Central Park to 25 other parks in the Metropolitan Area, where they are reproduced by loudspeakers.
